Providing End-to-End Solutions

RedPrairie's definition of end-to-end is a continuous process that starts and ends with the customer. In simple terms, it is the process of taking demand signals from the end user and using this and other data to drive manufacturing, distribution and transportation of products back to the customer. However, the definition is somewhat different for each of our target audiences.

For manufacturers, it means using demand signals to schedule and execute production in the sequence and quantities required, and getting the resulting products into customers' hands at the right time and the lowest cost.

For distributors, it means balancing supply with localized demand to reduce inventory while fulfilling orders as accurately, efficiently and timely as possible.

For retailers, it means using localized demand signals and merchandising plans to ensure the right mix and quantities of merchandise are in each store when customers want to buy, while efficiently scheduling store personnel based on traffic patterns and task requirements so shelves are full and customer service is maximized.
